on its credit. But what credit? If there is to be any credit, it must be based on something that is inalienable, and therefore, the basis for no credit. A man with an inalienable piece of land could raise no mortgage on it. His credit could only be based on the fact that the mortgage could be foreclosed on the land taken by the creditor. And so with the State. If it were to be sole proprietor of inalienable interests its credit for raising loans would be nil. Again, it could issue no Currency taxes, for it would have none; for, in the absence of any money but credit-notes current in the country appears to be an essential element of State-socialism, its notes would have no currency abroad, and could purchase no goods. If it did receive goods in exchange for surplus products exported, as it must be the sole importer, its paying itself taxes on its own purchases would be a fatuity in money-raising. Or, be it might be the sole proprietor on the basis of its products would keep the State coffers in funds. It is, however, to be remembered that Socialism as we are shown it, contemplates a very easy work to the workers, only a few hours a day, and the highest rate of remuneration for them, whether in cash or kind, which means production on the costless scale. In such case there would of course be no market abroad in competition with the cheapest labour, unless the whole world were brought under the same economic system—which we do not take for some years at least. The profits, therefore, on the State's exports would be about as valuable as its customs revenue on its own imports. From what source the State is to meet the requirements of existing loans, unless by repudiating them, and from what source it is to compensate the existing private proprietors for their expropriation unless by ignoring them, seems a puzzle. These are contingencies

What must arise from "State" is finally of everything, and the profitable, the ultimate transactions might happen to be. It may be said that the people living under this beneficent state of things would use no currency of money at all. But living with their private properties would like to see something for their worldly belongings, and would be anxious to know from what source their pensions were to be drawn. And so for the British holders of four, five or fifty millions of pounds, they are a most irritable class of people, and will make no end of a fuss if they are offered paper money for their coupons. There are a few difficulties of this sort looming in the distance in connection with the State's appropriation of all property and enterprise, which will require to be well thought out before we adopt the new system.

But the preliminary difficulties will perhaps be even greater when we come to ask the people to pool their properties. It would be very nice for one with nothing to go in shares with the owners of the great estates. But everybody with a little money or a talent will be loath to so part with it, even whether it will be just as good when the whole world is taken into partnership. There is something so snug in the thought of leaving one's own little fireplace, especially if one has a wife and children; and there are so few people who with any grit in them have not put the hope in them, and the expectation too, that even if they have not the little chimney-corner now, they will have it by-and-by.

Our country, with its vast unoccupied territory and its many chances, promises so many possibilities to the eye of hope, that very few with any buoyancy in their nature would like to throw in their fates and fortunes with the general leader, to whom a loose-eating existence, with no necessity for effort and loss of leisure, constitutes the ideal of terrestrial life. The annihilation of individual interest and personal effort, as under the monotonous reign of Socialism, would be simple misery to nine-tenths of the Anglo-Saxon race; while to the other tenth, it is just the stimulus of individual interest, if brought to the front of personal hope, that will prove the next potential, if not the only lever, if over they are to be raised from the wretchedness in which they are submerged.

No one seems to have thought it remarkable that the Peninsular and Oriental and Orient Mail Steamship Companies' large steam vessels should for several weeks have been diverted from their ordinary course of voyage to visit Hobart to convey the fruit of commerce to the mother land. Yet the fact is pregnant with significance, which ought to be within the view of the people of this colony. If it has paid these companies to make this diversion in the course of their magnificent steamships, rather than to be content with such cargo as they could obtain from Sydney and Melbourne, it might be supposed that our fruitgrowers would see in the new business a source of profit of which they ought to be quick to take advantage. No doubt Tasmania is a very fertile country, and can produce some varieties which cannot be grown near Sydney. But our table lands within comparatively easy access of Port Jackson have equally productive capacity, and with the variety which could be added from the warmer countries of the coast, I think it might be supposed that there ought to be no difficulty in supplying cargoes of fruit to the steamships leaving our port. That the attempts to furnish our market with brought fruits in place of those which are earned for 18000 miles have failed, I think must be succeeded is said to be due to the higher cost of labour in the colony than in America, as well as to the want of sufficient skill. Such an objection cannot be the same extent to the growth of fruit for export as for the home market. I would think the value and importance of the trade only needed to be pointed out to receive the favourable consideration of those who occupy our land. Of course, a fruit export business cannot be established in a day. But if there is any reasonable degree of enterprise our fruit-growers ought to share in a business which, by supplying the European market at a season when there is no fresh fruit from local sources, would give them a considerable profit. If they are prepared to supply the steamships which necessarily make their headquarters in Sydney, there will be no disposition to send the steamships to ports outside the ordinary course. In this respect they have a shipping advantage of which they will not take full advantage, if they only possess a reasonable degree of enterprise.

The City Council is to be commended for allowing no time to needlessly elapse in putting in execution a newly acquired right.

city. There has been long a contrast between the roadways and the pathways of Sydney that has been a wonder to the stranger within our gates. For the car-
